Friendship is nowadays often understood as a connection based on mutual trust that sustains and supports us – also and especially in times of crisis. Yet friendships are also highly complex, paradoxical formations, which are impossible to pin down in normative categories and which also hold profoundly subversive potential. While friendships help us conduct ourselves as individuals in the outside world, they can also provide a way to collectively make our voices heard and resist social (power) structures.

Inspired by Ragnar Kjartansson's video installation The Visitors, which can be viewed as a tribute to friendship, for the exhibition Acts of Friendship the team of the Migros Museum für Gegenwartskunst have selected works from the collection that in their view embody specific aspects of friendship. Over the exhibition period of eight months, around thirty works will be displayed in three thematic constellations.

While these works represent the personal visions, viewpoints, attitudes and approaches to friendship held by the individual members of our team, they also provide starting points for investigating the topic of friendship, which is as many-layered as the various attitudes and approaches themselves. It is certainly no coincidence that many of the works on display date from a time in which art, everyday life and social practice converged and fed into one another; known as relational aesthetics, these artistic practices from the 1990s are based on interpersonal relations and interactions. Not only did they accompany the beginnings of our museum and leave traces in its collection; today they also provide us with the impetus to build on old and new friendship networks and to integrate local communities.

Acts of Friendship is primarily concerned not with the caring and nurturing friendships forged within our most intimate circle, but rather with fellowships and value systems that reach far into the social and political spheres – complexities, alliances and solidarity. There is not far to go from coming together and conversing in close and trusted company to a sense of community that makes us take a public stand for our convictions and values, turning us into a politically active and acting collective.
